From Feast to Fridge: Healthy Ways to Enjoy Thanksgiving Leftovers

By Sydney Gurney, Extension Assistant Professor

Thanksgiving is a time for gathering with loved ones, expressing gratitude, and enjoying delicious food. But when the holiday feast is over, many families find themselves with a refrigerator full of leftovers. Rather than eating the same meal for days or letting extra food go to waste, Thanksgiving leftovers offer an opportunity to create nutritious, affordable meals.

Get Creative with Leftovers

Leftover turkey is an excellent source of protein and can easily be incorporated into a variety of healthy dishes. Try adding turkey to vegetable soup, whole-grain wraps, salads, or casseroles. Leftover roasted vegetables can be added to omelets, soups, or grain bowls. Even cranberry sauce can be repurposed as a topping for oatmeal or plain yogurt. Incorporating vegetables, whole grains, and lean proteins helps create balanced meals that provide essential nutrients.

Keep Food Safety in Mind

While leftovers are convenient, proper food storage is essential to prevent foodborne illness. According to the USDA, perishable foods should be refrigerated within two hours of preparation or serving. Store leftovers in shallow, airtight containers to help them cool quickly. Refrigerated leftovers should be eaten within three to four days or frozen for later use. When reheating leftovers, ensure they reach an internal temperature of 165°F.

Reduce Waste and Save Money

Making the most of Thanksgiving leftovers isn't just good for your health; it's also good for your wallet. Planning meals around leftover ingredients can reduce food waste and stretch your grocery budget. Consider freezing extra turkey in meal-sized portions for easy use in future recipes.

This Thanksgiving, remember that the holiday feast doesn't have to end when the table is cleared. With a little creativity and attention to food safety, leftovers can become delicious, nutritious meals your family will enjoy for days to come.
